1. The non-Communist parties in the coalition Government differ from the dominant element of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in that the policies they advocate emphasize the national interest, whereas the policies of the CCP emphasize the interests of international Communism. The gulf between the two groups is wide and irreconcilable. No prominent member of these parties has been won over to the point where he will do more than give lip service to CCP policy.
  2. At the time of the convocation of the CPPCC and the establishment of the Government, the minority party leaders realized that the CCP did not intend to allow the minority parties any independent political life and that their role was confined to helping in governing those segments of the population which the CCP was not yet prepared to manage and to aid in completing the conquest of China by political means. They then began to think and plan in terms of clandestine anti-Communist political activity. The basis of this plan is for the leaders to continue to cooperate with the CCP while the lower strata of the party go underground and become clandestine. The Communists have urged that the minority parties open branch headquarters and recruit members. The party leaders have complied, but only symbolically. Branch headquarters have been opened and some overt recruiting done; this has made it possible to open covert branch headquarters and recruit extensively on a covert basis.
  3. The non-Communist party leaders are convinced that a world war is inevitable. They believe that an anti-Communist coalition will emerge in China as the result of such a war, and that they can spearhead such a movement. They feel that the Kuomintang in its present form, can have no place in this movement, although individual Kuomintang members can.
  4. The minority party leaders believe that the Chinese Communists plan to make every effort to take Taiwan. They believe that the Communists will not succeed unless the Soviets help them with aircraft and shipping.
